MAGIC CHEF

TV CANDIDS
by Terrence O'Flaherty

I had never spent the day with a soap opera queen before—and when she hears I called her that, I'll probably never spend another.

Her name is Mary Stuart and she plays the role of Joanne Tate in "Search For Tomorrow," a daytime serial now in its 13th year on CBS television.

My infatuation with Mrs. Tate began several years ago when I was temporarily felled by some exotic malady and had taken to my bed for a few days. All I had had to eat was a bowl of junket and cup of tea and I didn't have the strength to turn the dial.

I recovered from my illness but I never quite got over "Search For Tomorrow." I was fascinated to see how any interest could be sustained by the nine minutes of drama which were strained through the commercials and the station breaks in this 15-minute show.

It is due in great measure to the performing skill of Miss Stuart and it was a source of satisfaction to learn that she was nominated for an Emmy last year as The Best Leading Woman in a Continuing Role.

The award went to Shirley Booth in "Hazel" but the nomination was a triumph for the daytime serials because they get little publicity.

Miss Stuart was in town recently and we got together to talk about her own search for tomorrow in what must now be The World's Oldest Floating Television Drama.

Her skill as an actress is far above the material she brings to life although I'm certain she would be the last to admit it. Her devotion to the show is complete.

"We rehearse thoroughly and seem never to have enough time, but when we get on the air live something magic happens. I begin to believe it all and tears will come when you least expect them. Last week I even burned a hand on a cold pot on the stove. It was cold during rehearsal but it was hot on the air."

The daily serials are filled with unbelievable tragedies and are the source of humor for critics (when they're well) and adventure for millions of women with their hand on the ironing board and their minds in neutral.

"Surely we've had more than an average family's share of trouble," said Miss Stuart. "If you list them it makes the show look ridiculous but taken a day at a time for 13 years, they form dramatic capsules. And if they're well performed they assume a reality for viewers that nighttime shows can't do even in 60 minutes."

In private life she has a happy marriage to a dashing young man in the broadcasting business named Richard Krollik. They have two young children and this was the first time they had been separated. She telephoned them while I was in the hotel and a crisis had arisen. Her seven-year-old son had refused to go to school while she was gone, claiming an eye ache. Her conversation with him sounded like something out of a "Search For Tomorrow" script:

"Now, Jeffrey I'd really feel a lot better if when I come home I find that you've gone to school... Yes, I know, Jeffrey... Yes, we all have our problems. Mother has her problems too, don't forget... Well now I think you should either be in school or go to the doctor. Don't you think so Jeffrey?... Darling please stop crying and listen to mother. What have you been doing when you weren't in school... Well, Jeffrey I can't see how you can sit home and watch television for three days when you can't see well enough to go to school..."
